SCRAPS FROM LONDON PAPERS. LONDON, Sept. 22.

Curious Love Letter .- A young woman had lived a servant at a respectable farmhouse, at the village of L----, in Northamptonshire, whose sweetheart was an honest rustic of the same place, but whom cruel fate had at length destined to move to a distant part of the country, which, instead of diminishing, only served to increase their mutual regard. They were now, of course, obliged to have resort to correspondence; but, alas! how was this to be carried on? for poor Mary could not write: but it was not long before she received a letter from William, wherein he declared the increased ardor of his love, and implored her to marry. She was now compelled to have recourse to a confidential female friend to assist her in reading the letter, and who readily offered to write an answer; but no, Mary could not even to her friend impart the main secret, and declined the proffered service; yet as true love is never at a loss for the means of invention, Mary adopted the following concise method: Having procured a sheet of writing paper, with the end of a burnt stick from the hearth she formed the little top i, and inclosed a small piece of sheep's wool, which comprised Mary's significant answer, "I woel." Her friend wrote the superscription, and the letter was sent off, post haste; and it was well understood and received with as much real pleasure, as any belles lettre could have been. Banns were soon after published, and they were married with as little delay as possible.

Among the circumstances which almost daily thicken around us to shew the industry and preconcerted system of the present Opposition in England is the return of Mr Cobbett to that country; his flight from which sufficiently indicated his regard to personal safety, to warrant us in believing that he would not return without adequate assurance of important changes in contemplation.

The Maid's Soliloguy. A PARODY.

The maid alone, with Milton in her hand, opens to that celebrated passage, " Hail wedded love! mysterious law, Sec.

Our maker bids increase; who bids abstain, But our destroyer, for to God and man? It must be so! Milton thou reasonest well-Else why this pleasing hope, this fond desire, This longing after something unpossessed? Or whence this secret dread, this inward horror Of dying unespous'd; why shrinks the soul Back on itself, and startles at virginity? 'Tis reason, faithful reason, stirs within us; 'Tis nature's self that points out an alliance, And intimates a husband to the sex. Marriage! thou pleasing, and yet anxious thought! Thro' what new scenes and changes must we pas-Th' unchanging state in prospect lies before me; But shadows, clouds and darkness rest upon it.

Here I will hold. If nature prompts the wish (And that she does, is plain from all her works) Our duty and our interest bid, indulge it, For the great end of nature's law is bliss; But yet-in wedlock woman must--obey! I'm weary of these doubts, the priest shall end them Nor rashly do I venture loss and gain: Bondage and pleasure meet my thoughts at once. I wed-my liberty is gone for ever, But happiness from time itself secured! Love first shall recompence my loss of freedom; And when my charms shall fade away, my eyes Themselves grow dim, my stature bend with year. Then virtuous friendship shall succeed to love; Then, pleas'd I'll scorn infirmity and death,
